3. Klotz, L. K., Walker, G., & Martin, P. (2011). "Early identification and retention of at-risk nursing students." Journal of Professional Nursing.

Describes outcomes of longitudinal study involving all nursing schools in the East Texas region that explored academic, social and psychological factors that might impact retention of nursing students. There were a number of identified factors but the most significant by far was the reading level of students entering the nursing program. Because of the large sample size and the significance of the findings, this study was chosen by the Texas Higher Education Coordinating Board as an exemplar and regions across the state were funded to replicate it.
